SATURDAY, AUGUST 25, 1883.

THE "DAYLIGHT" LIBEL CASE.

AT the Norfolk and Norwich Assizes, on Thursday, August 9th, before Mr. Justice Day, Edward Burgess and James Ashby Burgis were indicted for unlawfully and maliciously publishing a certain defamatory libel of and concerning one Lewin Samuel, in a certain paper called Daylight, of which they were the proprietors, publishers, and printers, at Norwich, on the 14th April. The Court was crowded. Many of the jurors were challenged by both the prosecution and the defence. Mr. Horace Browne, with whom was the Hon. J. de Grey, conducted the prosecution (instructed by Mr. Sparrow); and Mr. E. Clarke, Q.C., M.P. (specially retained), and Mr. Poyser (instructed by Messrs Bavin and Daynes), were for the defendants. Defendants, on their arraignment, pleaded not guilty, and Mr. Clarke put in a plea of justification, on which issue was joined. Mr. Horace Browne opened the case for the prosecution, after which some legal hair-splitting took place between the learned counsel upon the law in respect to cases of libel. John William Clark, clerk in the office of Mr. Sparrow, solicitor, said he remembered Saturday, April 14, of the present year, and on that day he went to 14, Exchange-street, the office of the Daylight newspaper, and bought the paper produced. In that paper he had read the paragraph which the learned counsel had read to the jury. He knew the prosecutor, who was a tailor and clothier, and lived at the Guildhall Corner. He believed the libel referred to him. The libel complained of appeared in the Daylight, under the heading of "Obadiah's Norwich Gossip." In it the writer asserted that the defendant was a Jew money-lender. The first witness called for the defence was Alison Mainwaring, Northumberland-street, Heigham, who was examined by Mr. Poyser. He said about a year ago he was in the employ of the Norwich Loan and Discount Office, the business of which was carried on at Fern House, Castle Meadow. The business was carried on by Lewin Samuel and Solomon Samuel, and he acted as bailiff for the firm. He received instructions to execute warrants sometimes for Lewin Samuel. He remembered making a seizure on the premises of John Betts at Ryburgh at four o'clock in the morning. At the time he went in Betts was in bed. Robert McCormack, waiter, Yarmouth, said on the 8th of October, 1881, he went to the Eastern Counties Loan Office for a loan. He saw Mr. Barton there, and in consequence of what he said he called again in a few days and saw Mr. Lewin Samuel. He got a cheque for £25, and accompanied by Barton he went and cashed it. He then went back and gave Samuel £2, and he was to pay the remainder in monthly instalments of a like amount. The total sum which he was indebted to Mr. Lewin Samuel was £37 10s. He told him that he would have to pay 5 per cent., but witness signed a document, the contents of which he knew nothing about. He subsequently found it was a bill of sale for £37 10s. Two months after he borrowed this money his goods were seized, and sold for £20 3s. 6d. Mr. Lewin Samuel then brought an action against him for £28 17s., and it was tried in the Yarmouth County Court. A verdict was given against him, and altogether he paid £49. At the end of December, 1881, he borrowed a sovereign of Mr. Samuel, who retained 1s., so really he obtained 19s. When the case was tried the judge disallowed the costs. George James Grief, Yarmouth, stated that he asked for a loan of £20 at the Eastern Counties Office, and he received £18 in gold, £2 being retained for charges. He subsequently borrowed other sums, the total amount being £69 11s. He was to repay what he borrowed in monthly instalments of £2 10s. Up to the 20th of October, 1882, he had repaid £62 6s. in cash, and he had also supplied Mr. Lewin Samuel with fish to the amount of £10. This made £72 for £69 received. Later on Barton and two men came to his premises to make a seizure for over £80, and charged £4 10s. as expenses for making the levy. He signed a document, the contents of which he knew nothing about, but he found out afterwards that it was a bill of sale. Barton could not seize anything as there was a previous bill of sale on his premises. Barton assaulted his wife, and was sentenced to six months' imprisonment. Maria Abbard, and Joseph Turner, schoolmaster, also testified to the borrowing of money, and the extortionate demands made for the advances. The learned judge observed that he thought the prosecutor's business had been thoroughly exposed to the public. The jury then returned a verdict of not guilty under his lordship's direction, which was received sub silentio, but the result of the trial cannot fail to meet with public approval.

ON Friday a man aged sixty years, named John Jones, shopkeeper, Daisy Bank, near Bilston, leaped down a disused pit shaft in Bilston, of the depth of 136 yards, at the bottom of which were thirty-two feet of water. Before leaping he pulled off his coat and hat, and deliberately walked towards the mouth. When just getting over the fencing he was seized by a passer by, but shook him off, and jumped. The mangled body was recovered on Saturday night in the presence of hundreds of people.

IF the Blue Ribbon Army can only get hold of Amy Greig, an old lady at Oldham, they will make a good catch. Just as that veteran toper of Leeds, Jane Johnson, proved to be a splendid haul for the Salvation Army when they induced her to reform, so this Oldham lady might turn out a great attraction at Blue Ribbon meetings if she could be prevailed upon to overcome her penchant for whisky. According to her own confession, she has already spent in liquor £250 which she inherited three weeks ago, and she says she likes whisky so much that she could drink a bucketful at a time.

ON Saturday evening the Rev. J. C. Saunders, M.A., Downing College, curate in charge of St. Barnabas, Cambridge, and junior Proctor of the University for the ensuing year, met with an accident whilst riding his bicycle. When going at a great speed his machine came in contact with a large stone, and he was precipitated to the ground, falling on the right side of his head and face. Fortunately no bones were broken, but the face became very much swollen, and the eyes greatly discoloured, and the injuries he sustained prevented him from preaching on Sunday morning.

AN inquest was held on Saturday on the body of a clerk named Jacklin, who was engaged at the Northampton Gas Works. Before leaving the works deceased, being thirsty, drank a quantity of sodawater from a bottle, and was taken ill and conveyed home in a cab. He remained ill twenty-six hours and then expired. The post-mortem examination disclosed the fact that there was acute inflammation of the bowels, the cause of which was a small opening in the intestine, close to the stomach, at the side of an old ulcer, which was covered by a slight membrane, which was broken by the force of the sodawater. A verdict of death from natural causes was returned.

THE BURNING OF AN ASYLUM FOR LUNATICS AT SOUTHALL.

[SUBJECT OF ILLUSTRATION.]

THE quiet village of Southall, within a few miles of London, was, early on Tuesday morning, the scene of a terrible occurrence, which resulted in the death of five persons, and injury to several others. Just before two o'clock the sleeping residents were roused by cries of fire, and on hastening into the highway they were appalled to see Dr. Boyd's private lunatic asylum in flames. They could hear terrible cries from the inmates gathered at different windows, and in the dark, and away from immediate organised assistance, they were almost helpless in the work of rescue. Mr. William Webber, of the North-road Farm, which is within gunshot of the asylum grounds, was the first to reach the building, and he saw at once how speedy must be the succour that could be effectual. He ran through the village streets giving the alarm, and then at once returned to the burning premises. There he found a police-officer named Doughton, and they were joined presently by Mr. Abbott, son of the late editor and proprietor of the British Beekeeper's Journal. For a considerable time they were alone in the difficult and dangerous task of assisting the terror-stricken sufferers to escape.

The mansion now burnt was built by Sarah Jennings, the first Duchess of Marlborough, but was not long occupied by her. For many years previous to its being tenanted by Dr. Boyd, who perished in the flames, it had been used as a private lunatic asylum by Dr. Stewart, who, as well as Dr. Boyd, received patients of the wealthier classes. It was a fine old building, possessing many architectural beauties, and with its ornamental grounds facing the Uxbridge-road, it constituted a quaint and picturesque sight. Like many of the country houses built in Queen Anne's time, it was a square block, but a notable feature in it were two high towers—one at either end—which gave grace and dignity to the structure. Round the entire building was a ditch about six feet deep, probably put there for drainage purposes; and in recent years there had been added to the westernend of the house a long wing of two storeys. It was by this wing, which stood much lower than the house itself, and was overlooked by the westernmost tower, that most of the escapes were effected.

The cook (Eliza O'Loghlen) was the first to give the alarm to Dr. Boyd and his family, yet, strangely enough, she is among the dead. From the first there could have been no hope of saving the premises, for as soon as the flames got a hold there was on every hand material to feed them. The whole of the walls, as may often be seen in old-fashioned houses, consisted of painted wooden panels; the flooring old and dry; the stairways, too, were of old seasoned timber; and an idea of the intensity and fierceness of the fire may be gathered when it is stated that within an hour the property was a blazing furnace. Mr. Webber, on arriving, made his way with Doughton to the back of the house, and in an upper window of the new wing they saw a cluster of scared faces. The flames were stealing rapidly in their direction, and those who were possessed of reason cried piercingly for help, while those who were patients stared mutely at the destruction around, making no effort for their release. A ladder was procured, and, placing it against the window, young Abbott ascended and handed the women to those below. Some of them resisted being taken out of their rooms, and it was only by the exercise of force that they were got out alive. One patient, an elderly female, proved exceedingly obstinate—so obstinate that even when she had been placed on the ladder she clambered back over the window-sill into the room. All in their nightdresses, some of them feeble, some of them moaning, some of them babbling meaninglessly, the unfortunate creatures, as they were seated or ran about the sward, under the lurid glare, presented a very piteous spectacle. The ground floor of the new wing was occupied by five male patients, with two attendants, brothers, named Frederick and William Ingle; and here again the rescuers experienced difficulty similar to that which they had with the women. The men, who were also in their nightshirts, resisted stoutly all attempts to free them from the doomed wing; and it was only by the exercise of well-meant force that they were got out. The flower and kitchen garden behind the mansion were a scene of indescribable confusion, and amid the roaring of the fire, the loud reports from the splitting timber, the rumbling noise of falling masonry, and the blinding light and overpowering heat, the wonder is that so many of the patients escaped. But it appears that in all their cases the insanity was of a chronic and harmless character. The villagers, who had by this time collected in considerable numbers, paid them kindly attention, and Mr. Fear, of the Red Lion Hotel, situated within a stone's throw, afforded the male patients temporary accommodation pending instructions from the Lunacy Commissioners; the females, four or five in number, were taken to The Shrubbery, another private lunatic asylum, kept by Miss Ross.

But while these unfortunate people were being cared for—and it only required a few minutes to pull them out of the way of imminent death—other and greater scenes of horror were transpiring. High up, and on the very top of the western tower, two women could be seen in the fitful light of the flames, which were making greedy passage towards them. Their doom appeared to be certain. From the windows below them the fire belched forth, smoke curled up to their very feet; and a light east wind fanned the blaze that was gliding along the roof. Beneath them every avenue of escape was cut off, and there they stood on a piece of masonry, the supports of which they could see were being consumed. The situation seemed hopeless. The firemen had not then arrived; there was not to hand the apparatus for saving life; the only thing available was a ladder, and that only reached to the height of the lower wing. The girls were forty or fifty feet in the air. They had escaped through a skylight, and ascended to the giddy altitude to preserve life as long as possible. The men below hailed them with words of encouragement and hope; they replied by imploring help in tones that could be heard above the raging noise of the conflagration. Women wept, and men ran aimlessly hither and thither in their distraction. A bright glare from the ignited roof of the main building told that aid must be on the instant if at all. The hapless girls, in their position of mortal peril, clung together and turned to look at their approaching fate. From the obscurity of the surrounding fields they could be seen from afar, outlined, in their white clothing and dishevelled hair, against the sky. They flung forth their arms, and asked, in wild and hysterical tones, for mercy. Aid was at hand. Webber and Doughton volunteered to ascend the tower, and they did so in the only way that was open to them. They got on to the roof of the lower wing, which, happily, still held good, and drawing up the ladder after them, with the exercise of great personal strength, they placed it against the tower, resting the bottom of the uprights in the leads, so that there might be one more chance for them should the roof beneath give way. So exciting was the moment that the spectators of the daring act held their breath. Only the roar of the fire disturbed the silence of the night. Through the black and eddying smoke Webber, with Doughton, made his way, now lost to the sight and anon disclosed to it by a burst of light. At length the top was reached, and sinewy brown arms were seen to encircle one of the girls and place her on the ladder. She descended two or three steps, and, whether she was stifled by the smoke or whether her nerves failed her is not known, but she lost her hold, and fell with a crash on the roof below. A sickening sensation pervaded the crowd as they heard her wail out, "I am dying." The second girl was got down in safety; the ladder was lowered, and in the next minute both were handed down to solid earth amid heartfelt cheers. It had not fared so well with others of the inmates. Five it was known, after there had been opportunity for inquiry, must have perished; another five it was found had been injured, three seriously and two slightly. Dr. Boyd, who was over seventy years of age, and a hale and hearty gentleman, when alarmed by the cook had plenty of time to escape; in fact, he left the house with his daughter, but returned, whether to get out two of the patients who were in that part of the building, or to recover some necessary documents, will never be known. He was never seen again, and it is thought he was suffocated before falling a prey to the fire. Another daughter of Dr. Boyd, with two or three of the servants, escaped across the roof, and by way of the new wing, but Miss Boyd, in jumping from the window, fell upon a conservatory, and sustained severe injuries. A nephew, Mr. Boyd, who had come from Texas, and was on a visit, also dropped from a window, but only slightly grazed his foot and wounded his mouth. In going round the lower part of the building, to ascertain whether there was still anyone needing aid, Mr. Webber came upon a man apparently dead. On raising his head he was found to be still alive, though unconscious. He proved to be Eli Hutton, the gardener, and it is supposed that in his extremity he must have jumped from the roof, a height of thirty-five or forty feet, on to the grass, and, rebounding, fallen into the ditch, where he was picked up. A female attendant, named Field, was also much injured by jumping, and now lies with Elizabeth Howe, the girl who fell from the ladder while descending from the tower. Nothing can be definitely stated about the manner of the death which befell Dr. Boyd and those who perished with him. The cook, who gave the alarm, occupied a room on the lower floor, and, according to the first accounts it was near her room the fire commenced. But subsequent inquiries tend to show that it was more vigorous on the second floor, and those who first saw it are generally agreed that it was there it broke out. It is further stated that the upper part of the premises were completely ignited before the lower portions were touched. It was on the second floor that Dr. Boyd and his son, Mr. William Boyd, slept in adjoining rooms. It is supposed, and it can only be supposed, that Mr. William Boyd had been aroused like the rest of the household, and that seeing his father returning, he had accompanied him, and so became a victim. Of the two patients who were buried in the ruins as little can be stated. One was Captain Williams, a retired naval officer of advanced years, and the other was Mrs. Cullimore, over eighty years of age, and sister of a leading dignitary of the Church of England.

LIST OF KILLED AND INJURED.

The following is a complete list of the killed and injured:—Killed: Dr. Robert Boyd, the proprietor; Mr. W. B. Boyd, his son; Captain Williams and Mrs. Cullimore, patients; and Eliza O'Loghlen, the cook. Injured: Eli Hutton, the gardener, who lies in a critical condition; Elizabeth Howe, scullery-maid, who is intermittently insensible and delirious from concussion of the spine and severe scalp wound; the female attendant named Field, who is also suffering from concussion of the spine and a wound on the left ankle; Miss Brunette Boyd, who has sustained three extensive wounds on the leg; Mr. Robert Boyd, her cousin, who has a large wound on the sole of his foot, and a wound on the face. All the other persons who were in the building at the time escaped or were rescued without further injury than the shock to their nervous system may occasion.

DR. BOYD.

Dr. Boyd was a gentleman over seventy years of age, who had long practised in Bolton-road, Mayfair, as a consulting physician in lunacy cases, and who was for many years superintendent of the Somersetshire Asylum. When he was superannuated there he bought this house at Southall from Dr. Stewart, and continued to receive patients at this place for a dozen years. He was greatly respected and liked in the neighbourhood. His son William was a young man about twenty-five, and was on the point of departure with his cousin Robert for Texas, to farm there.

LATER PARTICULARS.

The work of searching for the remains of Dr. Boyd, his son, and the three other persons who lost their lives in the fire at the private lunatic asylum at Southall on Tuesday, was completed on Saturday, when, for the first time since operations were commenced, fragments of human bones were discovered. There were three distinct collections, and it is believed that the remains must be those of three, if not four, of the unfortunate people. The first discovery was made about an hour after the men recommenced work in the morning, the bones being found in the basement, directly under the position of Dr. Boyd's bedroom and dressing-room. A second discovery was made about ten o'clock by workmen engaged in excavating in the corridor at the north-east of the ruins, something like a dozen yards from the other spot. An examination was conducted by Dr. M'Donald. It was generally believed that a further discovery would be made during the removal of the débris from the servants' hall, over which were situated the bedrooms of Captain Williams and Mrs. Cullimore, the unfortunate patients. Their opinion was verified about half-past four. Mr. George Gibson, to whom the work was entrusted, estimates that he excavated at least 2000 tons of rubbish. A large quantity of silver was found on Saturday, the greater portion of it having been melted. Two medals, which had belonged to Captain Williams, were turned up, on one of which could be read "Admiral Rodney, Portobello." A bedroom timepiece was found to have stopped at twenty minutes past three, at which time flames were leaping from every window of that part of the mansion which was destroyed.

THE TRAGEDY AT WALTHAMSTOW.

[SUBJECT OF ILLUSTRATION.]

ON Saturday, at the Stratford Petty Sessions, William Gouldstone, twenty-six years of age, described as a blacksmith, who lived at 8, Courteney-place, St. James's-street, Walthamstow, was charged on remand with having murdered his five children on the 8th inst.—namely, Charles Gouldstone, aged three years and a half; Herbert Gouldstone, two years and a half old; and Frederick Gouldstone, aged sixteen months, by drowning them in a cistern; and two twin infants, seven days old, by striking them on the head with a hammer. Mr. H. Batchelor conducted the prosecution on behalf of the Treasury authorities, and Mr. J. W. Atkinson, solicitor, Stratford, represented the accused.

The prisoner, against whom a coroner's jury has already returned a verdict of wilful murder, was placed in the dock shortly after eleven o'clock. After a hurried glance at the crowded court, he quietly folded his arms across the dock-rail, and while the charge was being read he again gazed around the court, nodding, with a smile, to some one whom he recognised. The accused, while maintaining an unconcerned aspect, so far as regarded the proceedings, very often changed his position. He would stretch across the dock, with his head resting on his folded arms on the bar in front of him; then he would stand erect, with great firmness; and next he would lean against the siderail of the dock, all the while, however, maintaining his cool demeanour. A tin mug full of water was brought into the dock for his use during the hearing, but he merely sipped a little water, and standing in the centre of the dock, rested his elbows on the rail till the case was concluded.

Mr. Batchelor, at the commencement of the proceedings, intimated that the evidence he would call would be very short, and he asked that the prisoner should be committed for trial.

Mrs. Hamilton, a lodger at 8, Courteney-place, St. James's-street, and who attended as nurse upon Mrs. Gouldstone, was recalled and cross-examined by Mr. Atkinson. She said: I have known the prisoner since the 1st of June, and had ample opportunities to notice his demeanour. Up to this time he was always very kind to his wife. The twins were born on August 1, and after that date I noticed a great difference in the prisoner. I have never seen him the worse for drink but once. He was not addicted to drink. After August 1 he appeared to be in a desponding state. He would come in and sit down and seldom speak to any one. I have never heard him speak a thing against his wife, and never heard him complain of her pawning his things. He was very kind to her, and I have never known him to speak a cross word to her. I have never heard his wife say that she wished the children were dead. Since the birth of these twins I have noticed he appeared absent. He never said anything to witness about a fit of kleptomania coming on him. He did not speak to that effect on the Sunday previous. As to the twins I heard him say nothing when I was by his wife's side. When he was sitting on the fireguard in the kitchen just before the murder he was not gazing into the fire. He had his back to it, and was twiddling a piece of string about. I did not notice that there was a slip noose in the cord. It may have been there, but I did not notice it. He looked in the bedroom and muttered something. I saw him in the bedroom after the occurrence, and I did not notice a hammer till afterwards, when the constable asked for it. After the death of the three children I said, "Oh, you wicked man, what have you done?" He replied, "I am happy now." I saw one of the children first, and shortly afterwards the other two. I went to see if they were dead or alive, when I saw him carrying the first one. He seemed very excited—not absent or wandering, but excited. He said, "I've done it, I've done it." When the constable took him into the bedroom, he said to Mrs. Gouldstone, "I have murdered all your children; you wished them dead, and now you have got your wish." I do not know any of his family.

Police-constable William Cheeseman, 86 N, said: I was on duty at St. James's-street, Walthamstow, on the day in question, and was called to 8, Courteney-place. I went into the kitchen, and saw three children lying on the floor there, the prisoner being in a stooping position over them. He had his hat and coat off, and his shirt sleeves were tucked up. The clothes of the children appeared to be drenched with water, and were thoroughly wet. When the prisoner saw me he said, "Good evening, policeman; I have done it now, I am happy, and am ready for the rope." I told him that what he said would be used in evidence against him, and then he put on his hat and coat, and asked me to let him see his wife. I then took him into the bedroom to his wife, and when I got there his wife said, "Oh! you wicked man; what have you done?" The prisoner said, "I have killed all your children, you will be single again, and I shall be hanged. His wife asked him for money, and he gave it her. The prisoner then kissed his wife, wished her "Good-bye," and I took him away. On the way to the station the prisoner said, "When I took my money last week I thought of buying a revolver to do it with; but I altered my mind, as I thought it would make too much noise." He also said, "I had a hard job with the two biggest, but the other little one I soon settled. I thought it was getting too hot, for I have had five kids in three years and a half, so I thought it time to put a stop to it." When I got him to the station he said, "I did it like a man." When the charge was read over to him at the station he said "Quite right, sir." When I saw the three children at the house I satisfied myself that they were dead.

By Mr. Atkinson: The moment the prisoner saw me he spoke first. He seemed excited at the time, but not such an excitement as from drink. He had no appearance of drink. When he spoke about being "ready for the rope," he had not a piece of rope in his hand. When in the bedroom I did not hear the wife say that she wished the children were dead. She did not supplement her request for money with the wish that the children were dead. The whole of the children, as a matter of fact, were not dead. It was at the station that he said "Quite right, sir." He said nothing there about not having the money to support his children. I did not hear the word "pawn" mentioned in the wife's presence. The wife made no reply whatever when he said he had murdered all her children. I saw the two infants were covered up. They had blood on them. I did not see them move. When the wife asked for money he gave her some—a two-shilling piece or a half-crown and a shilling. It was about twenty minutes to six that I went to the house. I saw no evidence of any meals about—no provisions of any kind.

Police-constable James Honey, 41 N Reserve, was next called. He said: I am stationed at the Lea-bridge-road. At about ten o'clock on August 9 I was in the High-street, Walthamstow, and in consequence of information received I went to Dr. Twining, and then to 8, Courteney-place. When I got there Dr. Twining was there and examining the bodies of the three children in the kitchen.

Mr. Batchelor, in reply to the Bench, said he did not propose to call Dr. Twining, as he was very ill. If it was necessary at the trial he would, of course, have to do so.

Examination continued: Dr. Twining handed me the piece of tunic I produce. I could see the three children were dead. I went into the front room and saw the two other infants. One of them was bleeding from the mouth, and both their heads appeared to be seriously injured. I remained there till Dr. Gould came.

By Mr. Atkinson: The string which had been around the eldest child's neck was not tight; it was loose.

George Foulkard, a police inspector of the N Division, stationed at Lea-bridge-road Station, said: I was at the station on the 8th inst., when the prisoner was brought in by Police-constable Cheeseman. The constable said, "This is a charge of murder; this man has murdered his five children." The prisoner said, "That is right, sir. I did it like a man, too." I went to the house with Dr. Gould, and at about eight o'clock returned to the station and charged the prisoner with murdering his three children, Charles, Herbert, and Frederick, and with attempting to murder his two male infants. He said, "Quite right, sir. What condition was the missus in? I suppose some of you gentlemen have been around." Dr. Gould said, "Tolerable." The prisoner then asked, "Are the two young ones dead?" I said, "No." At half-past eight o'clock the following morning I charged him with the murder of the two younger children. He said, "Yes, sir. The other two are dead, then?" I said, "Yes." When I went to 8, Courteney-place, I examined the cistern. It is about 6 ft. from the floor, high up, near the ceiling. It was the top of it that was 6 ft. from the floor. The top of it to the ceiling was about 10 in., the cistern being about 14 in. deep.

By Mr. Atkinson: The prisoner volunteered these statements. He was a little excited, I thought, but very slight. He was not so excited as I should expect. He braced himself up when he said, "I did it like a man too." About two hours had elapsed since the prisoner last saw his wife. Then he asked me how she was.

Henry Wheatley, police-constable, 208 N, stationed at Lea-bridge, said: About a quarter to seven on the evening of the 8th inst. I was in the cell passage of the station leading to the cell where the prisoner was. The prisoner said to me, "I have had an extra drop of drink to-day to accomplish this job. There's five of them gone to glory, and it is a good job too." Later on, at half-past seven o'clock, he said, "I am sorry for my wife and parents; but the children will be better off in Heaven, if there is such a place. It is better than leaving them to the mercy of the world." At about nine o'clock he said, "I wish I had killed the little ones out of the way. I don't know if I hit them once or twice. I have had this playing on my mind for a long time."

By Mr. Atkinson: He volunteered these statements. He was under my immediate observation all the time. I did not hear him rambling or mumbling to himself. I observed no traces of drink about the prisoner. He first stated he had killed the five, and then said he wished he had killed the little ones. I did not in the least observe any strangeness about him; he was very cool.

Mr. Henry Gould, examined by Mr. Batchelor, said: I reside at Lea-bridge-road, Leyton. I am a M.R.C.S., and L.S.A. London, and divisional surgeon of police for the district. On the 8th inst., at six o'clock, I was called by Inspector Foulkard, and went to 8, Courteney-place. I went into the front room on the first floor, and there on a bed saw two children only a few days old. They were male children. I examined them, and found they had both received injuries to the head. I felt that the skull of each was fractured, and blood and froth were issuing from them. I thought it impossible that the children could live. I went into the kitchen, and there saw three children lying in a row, side by side, their feet being all one way. They were quite dead, and their clothes saturated with water. One of the children was naked, Dr. Twining having taken the clothes off. I saw no marks of violence on two of them, but on the eldest (Charles) I found on the neck an indentation mark of a stout cord. It had been put around the neck. At seven o'clock I again went to the house, and saw that one of the two infants had died. Soon after seven o'clock the next morning I went and found that the other one was dead. Since that time I have made post-mortem examinations of the bodies of the whole of the five children. As to the two younger, I found that their death had been caused by the violence used that fractured the skull of each. As to the three others, from the condition of the heart and lungs, I came to the conclusion that they died from suffocation, caused by drowning. All the bodies of the three children were well nourished. On the three there were no marks of violence, except the indentation on the neck of the eldest.

By Mr. Atkinson: I have only seen the prisoner in connection with this case. I would not like to say that I am perfectly acquainted with the "Cyclopædia of Practical Medicine."

Mr. Wells, the clerk, said this was scientific evidence of the doctor, and he was not well up in questions of insanity, if that was to be referred to, as that was a speciality.

Mr. Batchelor concurred with Mr. Wells that insanity was not a question for the consideration of this Court.

Mr. Atkinson said he would not press the question. This concluded the evidence, and the prisoner was committed for trial, Mr. Atkinson intimating that the accused would reserve his defence.

THE MURDER AT IPSWICH.

[SUBJECT OF ILLUSTRATION.]

AN inquest was held at Ipswich on Tuesday afternoon, last week, on the body of Lilian Alice Lyons Meek, the little girl who was murdered the previous evening in that town. Mary Caroline Woodgate, wife of a labourer, proved that deceased was her child before her marriage, and the prisoner Thomas Lyons Day was its father. For several days he had been near her house, and on Monday asked her to let him come and see the child. He said he wanted to say good-bye, as he was going away again. She gave him leave to come when her husband was at home, and in the evening he came. He took the little girl on his knee, talked to her, and kissed her, and then put his hand to her throat and cut it. Her husband struggled with Day, by whom he was stabbed under the right ear. William Woodgate, the wounded man, confirmed his wife's evidence, and said that the prisoner asked the child who was her father, and when she said Woodgate was, he told her she should not call him father. The jury found a verdict of wilful murder against Thomas Lyons Day.

MURDER AND ATTEMPTED SUICIDE.

[SUBJECT OF ILLUSTRATION.]

A SHOCKING discovery was made on Saturday afternoon at 152, St. Thomas's-road, Finsbury-park (corner of Gillespie-road), the residence of Mr. George Ludlow, a joiner, in the employ of Mr. Sage, shop-fitter, of Gray's-inn-road. On Mr. Ludlow returning home about two o'clock he was told by one of his elder children that his wife, Mrs. Susan Matilda Ludlow, had left home between nine and ten o'clock in the morning, and finding the back window open, he looked out and discovered that his little daughter, Emily Susan, aged two years, had been drowned in the cistern. He was so agitated that he did not take the body out of the cistern, but sent for the police, and on the arrival of the doctor it was found that life was extinct. The body of the little girl, Emily Susan Ludlow, was removed to the mortuary to await the coroner's inquest. Mrs. Ludlow, it is said, had previously exhibited signs of mental aberration, and had soon after the birth of the little girl attempted to take its life in a similar manner.

Late on Saturday night Mrs. Ludlow was charged at the Islington Police-station with wilfully murdering her female child, Susan Ludlow, aged two, by throwing her in a cistern filled with water at 152, St. Thomas's-road, Finsbury-park, on Saturday afternoon. Inspector Finney, of the N Division, said the prisoner could not be brought up to be placed in the dock as she was now quite mad, and was detained in the infirmary of the Islington Workhouse; she had been out of her mind for some time. It appears that Mrs. Ludlow had often threatened to kill herself and the child, and was subject to temporary fits of insanity, when she was quite unanswerable for her actions. Mr. Ludlow gave information to the police, and early on Sunday morning she was pulled out of the New River, near Essex-road, just after she had thrown herself in, by a police-constable of the N Division. The officer had seen the woman during the night sitting on the river-bank, and had several times passed her while on his beat. She was taken to the Islington infirmary, and was there identified.

SAD BOATING FATALITY.

[SUBJECT OF ILLUSTRATION.]

AN inquest was held before Dr. Grabham, of Pontefract, on the bodies of Sarah Turner and Sarah Elizabeth Lyons, two of the children who were drowned, the third body not having been recovered. The inquiry took place at the Crimean Tavern, and Mr. Carver acted as foreman of the jury. The first witness was John Turner, miner, Crimean Tavern-yard, who was rowing the boat across the river when it capsized. He identified the body of Sarah Turner as that of his daughter. She would have been thirteen years of age on Monday last. He took a boat about six o'clock belonging to Mr. Galloway. He was going to take some tools across to a steamer over the river with the intention of taking off some hooping. He took the five children for a ride and for amusement. It was a big six oar boat and there was plenty of room for all. He had two oars. He had used the same boat several times before, and had taken his wife and children with him. On Thursday evening he got within four yards of the steamer. The wind and the current rose very strong, and swung the boat round. The steamer was 100 yards from the dam. He nearly got to a boat on the other side, but could not reach it, as the boat swung him off, and the current drifted the boat towards the dam. He said to his daughter that they were going over the dam, and she began to shout, but could not make anyone hear. He got the oar into the water to turn the boat, but the bow of the boat struck the bottom, and made it go sideways, and knocked all of them out of it except Arthur Holmes, to whom he said, "Stick fast, or thou will be drowned." He caught hold of his daughter Anne, and he also caught his daughter Sarah by the frock, but he was obliged to let her go. He was on the top of the dam. There was a good deal of water, and that was pressing him and the child over, and if he had not let go the child all three would have had to go. He saw his daughter and the other children going down the river, his girl having the child Papworth in her arms. Two brothers named Connell went to his assistance in a boat with a rope at the end of it. They took Arthur Holmes out of the boat first, and his daughter Annie out of his arms, and then they took him into the boat and brought them all ashore. The body of his daughter Sarah was found between seven and eight o'clock. No one saw him from the steamer. He lost control over the boat. Galloway had not cautioned him not to take his boat; and it was not locked to keep him from taking it. He asked Mrs. Galloway for the keys, but she did not know what he wanted them for.—James Lyons, engine tester, Kirkstall-road, Leeds, identified the body of Sarah Elizabeth Lyons as that of his daughter. She was ten years old, and was on a visit to witness's wife's brother, John Galloway, at Castleford.—Edward Clarkson, a wheeler-up, said he took a boat and some grappling irons, and, along with two others, grappled near the dam, and then one hundred yards further down, and there found the body of Elizabeth Lyons, and took it ashore. They then tried again near the same place, and found Sarah Turner's body, which they landed. They tried to find the other body, but did not succeed. They had been grapling about three hours that day. There was about six inches of freshet and a very strong wind blowing right down the river the previous night. The coroner addressed a few words to the jury, pointing out that the calamity was evidently one of accident, and though Turner might have been negligent there was no evidence of criminal culpability. The jury, after a brief consultation, returned a verdict to the effect that the two children had been drowned in the Aire and Calder rivers, and it being the opinion of several jurors that the witness Turner had not shown discretion in taking such a boat out on such a night with children in it, the coroner called him into the room, and cautioned him as to his future actions.

BITING A MAN'S NOSE.

[SUBJECT OF ILLUSTRATION.]

AT Newton Abbot Petty Sessions on Tuesday last week, before Admiral Cornish-Bowden, General Reynell-Taylor, H. E. Brown, and J. Vicary, Esqs., William Allin, a travelling practitioner of "the noble and manly art of self-defence," who visited Newton to attend the races, was charged with causing grievous bodily harm to William Manning, a labourer, at the Bell Inn on Saturday night. Mr. Burt defended. The evidence of complainant and his witnesses, Eli Furze and Richard Ridgeway, went to show that on going into the Bell Inn shortly after ten on Saturday night, Furze asked him to drink, and passed the cup for the purpose. Prisoner, without the least provocation, asked in a most insulting manner who he was, and struck him a violent blow. A scuffle ensued, and prisoner subsequently pinned complainant up in a corner and bit his nose. He shortly after left. Both were sober, and it was not until after complainant was struck that he returned the blow. Prisoner's eye was still very black. Dr. Richard Grimbly said complainant came to him late on Saturday night, having a lacerated wound on the nose, which was bleeding profusely. Witness gave him instructions what to do to it, and told him to call again on Monday. He then found that a piece of skin was gone about the size of a shilling, leaving an open sore such as might be caused by a bite. It would probably leave a scar that he will never be rid of. Police-constable Salter proved apprehending the prisoner at the Turk's Head shortly after eleven the same night. He was quite sober, and walked quietly to the station. He was committed for trial to the sessions.—Western Times.

BRUTAL ASSAULT.

[SUBJECT OF ILLUSTRATION.]

A TERRIBLE scene took place a few days ago at the cottage where Maria Martin lived. This ill-fated woman was murdered by Corder, and was buried by him in the Red Barn at Polestead, in the county of Suffolk. The cottage in question is now in the occupation of the son of Maria Martin and his wife, both of whom are upwards of sixty years of age. On Friday morning last this romantic spot was the scene of a most cruel outrage. The poor old lady, Mrs. Martin, was hanging out linen in the fine old orchard, which is studded with fruit trees of every description, more especially cherries, for which the ancient parish has been celebrated generations past, when some villain (name unknown) secreted himself behind the old kitchen door, and when Mrs. Martin entered he blinded her with some kind of powder; then, securing her hands behind her, he threw her into one corner of the house, and covering her with old bed clothes, &c., threatened to take her life if she made any alarm. The occurrence has caused quite a sensation in the county, and many strangers from afar have visited the spot, their curiosity being undoubtedly aroused from the fact of the place being so well known by the murder perpetrated there over half a century ago.

A MOTHER DROWNING HER OWN CHILD.

[SUBJECT OF ILLUSTRATION.]

LAST week furnished us with a host of domestic tragedies. On Sunday, at Newcastle, a woman named Smithers, in a fit of desperation or insanity, threw her daughter (a little girl between six and seven) into the cistern at the back of the house. The child's cries attracted the attention of the next door neighbour, but he was too late to save the child, who was dead upon his arrival.

SERIOUS PARTY RIOTS.

ON Saturday night a very serious party riot took place in Coatbridge, between Orangemen and Catholics. Since July 12 a most bitter feeling has existed between the parties, and the matter reached a crisis when the Home Rulers were holding a demonstration in honour of Lady Day. There were fully ten thousand people taking part in the procession, and when they reached the headquarters of the Orangemen, at Sunnyside, they were met with a volley of stones. In the course of a few minutes a scene which baffles description took place. Every imaginable kind of weapon was called into use; hundreds of persons were knocked to the ground and kicked. The windows of the shops in the locality were shattered. A strong body of police, under Captain Stewart and Inspector Cruickshanks, endeavoured to suppress the disturbance, but were very roughly handled. Captain Stewart received a blow on the head from a brick, causing a frightful wound, whilst Mr. Cruickshanks's leg was nearly broken by a kick. Several others of the force were knocked to the ground and received severe injuries. Twenty-six persons—nineteen Catholics and Orangemen—were arrested in the course of the evening and locked up.

AN exciting scene was witnessed in the Roman Catholic Church at Torquay on Friday. Whilst Mass was being said by Father Charles, a man named John Connolly, who has been employed as organ-blower, was seized with a sudden fit of madness supposed to be the result of a sunstroke, entered the church and commenced raving and swearing in a horrible manner. He attempted to lay hands on the church adornments and overpowered two persons who endeavoured to remove him. Father Charles succeeded himself in conducting the man out of the place, and he was given into the charge of the police. Connolly was brought before the magistrates on Saturday morning, and instructions were given to the medical officer for his conveyance to an asylum.

Items of News.

AT the Dublin Police-court, on Monday, two men were ordered to find substantial bail for having on Sunday night threatened with violence Francis Carey, a brother of the notorious informer, James Carey. The prisoners, with a third man, went to Carey's house, called him an informer, and were about to proceed to violence; but Carey seized his revolver, when they at once decamped. He followed, and gave them into custody.

ON Monday a large body of police attended at the eviction of a farmer named David Renshaw, near Banbridge, county Down. Shots were fired, and Head Constable Bryan Hanrahan was wounded in the stomach. A sub-constable named Smith was also wounded, being hit on the knee. Renshaw was arrested on the charge of having fired at the head constable. The news created consternation in the locality.

On Monday afternoon, at Sedgley, William Cotton, landlord of the Royal Hotel, Coseley, was fined £7 for defrauding the Inland Revenue by keeping sugar in an unauthorised place. Upon the Inland Revenue officer going into the defendant's cellar he found four ounces of loaf sugar on a cask. Defendant admitted he had used sugar in order to fine beer, which was the custom of brewers throughout England, and he contended that the Inland Revenue was not defrauded thereby.

A caution to butchers was administered by the Potteries Stipendiary Magistrate at Hanley on Monday, when he fined Hawson Slater, a butcher, of Wolstanton, near Hanley, £10 and costs, for having in his possession a number of animals suffering from foot-and-mouth disease, without reporting the same to the authorities.

Early on Sunday three men, who were rowing up river below London Bridge noticed a black object floating. On pulling towards the spot, they were surprised to find the mass to be the mutilated remains of a man in a decomposed state. They allowed the body to drive up on the flood tide, and shortly after passing beneath the centre arch of London Bridge the men in a River Police galley took charge of the body, which they towed to Queenhithe Dock, and on its removal in a shell to the Golden-lane mortuary it was found that both arms and the left foot were missing. The scald was bare and a portion of the flesh on the face was torn away. The body was nude.

Dr. Diplock, the coroner for the Southall district, has intimated that he can hold no inquest upon the human remains found amongst the ruins of Southall Park Asylum, as these are too scanty to admit of any identification. A private inquiry into the circumstances of the fire will, however, be held by some of the Lunacy Commissioners.

At Manchester on Monday morning William Howard, a betting man, was charged with violently assaulting Police-constable Dunhill. The officer attempted to arrest the prisoner for obstructing the thoroughfare, when he savagely bit the officer's thumb, and behaved so violently that it took five policemen and some civilians to take him to the station. He had been frequently convicted, and was sent to prison for three months' hard labour.

At the Middlesex Sessions, on Monday, Thomas Ridgway, nineteen, was convicted of stealing an overcoat, value £5 5s., the goods of Edward Joseph Hanson, in his dwelling-house. The prisoner is a thieves' supervisor—that is, a person who visits houses on the pretence of selling, and, on gaining admission, makes notes of the probable ways in which burglaries might be effected. In this case he stole the overcoat from the hall, put it on, and was walking off with it when he was given into custody. Some police officers proved former convictions against him. The Assistant Judge sentenced him to be kept in penal servitude for five years, and afterwards to be under the supervision of the police for three years.

A destructive fire occurred in the flax shed at Dundee Harbour on Monday. While a number of porters were turning over the flax for weighing purposes flames suddenly broke out, and spreading so rapidly that in a few minutes the shed and its contents—a hundred and fifty tons of flax—were ablaze. The workmen engaged had a narrow escape, and two were slightly burnt. Fire brigades prevented the flames from spreading to the adjoining sheds, which were stored with valuable goods. The origin of the fire is unknown. The damage is estimated at £3000; but the flax was fully insured.

On Monday, at the Southwark Police-court, Denis Regan, twenty-four, labourer, was charged with being drunk and disorderly in Thomas-street, Bermondsey, and with assaulting Police-constable 223, M division, while in the execution of his duty. The constable stated that on Sunday night he saw the prisoner and two other men in Thomas-street, Bermondsey. They were making a great disturbance, and he advised them to go away, whereupon the prisoner turned round and struck him with his clenched fist in the face and cut his lip. Witness then took him into custody, but he refused to go to the station and had to be taken by force. Another constable gave corroborative evidence, and proved four previous convictions against the prisoner for assault and riotous conduct. In answer to the charge, the prisoner said the constable followed him and his mates, and trod on his heels; but this the officer denied. Mr. Slade sentenced the prisoner to six weeks' hard labour.

George Sinfield, forty-six, labourer, living in High-street, Vauxhall, was charged on Monday, at the Lambeth Police-court, with assaulting his wife by striking her with his fist about the body and head and cutting her nose. The wife stated that for a long time the prisoner had ill-treated her and the children. A short time back he seriously injured her right arm. On Saturday night he came home, and after a few words struck her on the nose, and then on her body with his fist. Prisoner: She began it first. She said she would give me poison. Mary Murphy, a lodger, bore out the statement of the wife, and added that the prisoner pushed her when she went to the assistance of the complainant. Mr. Biron said the prisoner had acted in a very brutal way, and sentenced him to one month's hard labour.

At Leicester, on Monday morning, Isaac Anthony, shoe finisher, was charged with committing a murderous attack upon David Orton, an old man, who lies in a hopeless condition at the infirmary. The Chief Constable stated that Anthony attacked two men in a public-house, and then cut the landlord's lip open. Being ejected he attacked Orton, knocking him down and fracturing his skull. Blood issued from the ears and mouth of the man. The prisoner was remanded.

An alarming accident took place at seven o'clock on Monday morning at Selly Oak, a village three miles from Birmingham. An engine and a number of carriages left the rails of the West Suburban Railway, and dashed into the parapet of a bridge which it completely demolished. The driver and stoker managed to jump from the engine, and so escaped injury. Great damage was done to property, but no one was injured.

On Monday, at the Guildhall Police-court, John Henry Matthews, a labourer, who gave a false address, was charged on remand before Mr. Alderman Isaacs with stealing a silver watch from the person of the prosecutor in the Central Fish Market. About three o'clock in the afternoon of Saturday week a youth named Frederick White saw the prisoner standing by the side of the prosecutor, and from his action he asked him what he was doing. As the prisoner turned round he saw the prosecutor's watch in one hand and his chain in the other. He snatched the watch from the prisoner's hand and gave it to the prosecutor. He then pursued the prisoner and caused him to be apprehended. Police-sergeant Shillaker, 31, said there was a previous conviction and a sentence of seven years' penal servitude, and two years police supervision to follow, in January, 1878. Mr. Alderman Isaacs committed the prisoner for trial.

Herr Boss, a native of Berne, Switzerland, the restorer of the frescoes on the Islar Gate, Munich, and a young painter of great promise, is stated to have perished in the earthquake of Ischia. Herr Boss, who had been studying at Rome, was staying at the Piccola Sentinella, and when the earthquake occurred he and Herr Einsberg, a German artist, who perished with him, were sitting under the chandelier in the dining-room. Two of the hotel servants who escaped have communicated these particulars to the family of Herr Boss.

A boy named John Harrison, aged twelve, last week came to his death under peculiar circumstances in the circus at St. Helens. There is a trained mule brought into the ring, which, it is alleged, no one is able to ride but the trainer, and anyone from the audience is allowed to try to ride it, the consequent failures causing much amusement. On Wednesday the boy Harrison tried to ride the mule, and was, as usual, thrown off. A minute or so after he was observed to stagger up against the boxes, and to die almost immediately.

James Kelly, twenty-three, who was sentenced to death at the last sessions of the Central Criminal Court for the murder of his wife, Sarah Ann Kelly, and who was to have been executed on Monday last, has, by order of the Home Secretary, been reprieved, and his sentence altered to one of penal servitude for life.

At Brentford Petty Sessions on Saturday, Samuel Goddard, dairyman, Ealing, was charged with selling milk adulterated with eighteen per cent. of added water. Defendant or his assistant was selling the milk from a cart. Fined £3, or one month's imprisonment. Richard Wild, milk vendor, Isleworth, was charged with selling milk adulterated with forty-four per cent. of added water. The defendant: It was not adulterated to that extent when it left my place. I chastised the boy for it. Mr. Hogarth, chairman, said it was one of the worst cases they had had in this court. It was cruel that such stuff should be sold to children and sick people. Fined £5, or one month. The money was paid in both cases.
